META SARMIENTO

It’s hard not to talk to Meta for hours. He’s the type of person that you want to hear all about. He is one of those rare individuals that are unabashedly themselves, exuding a type of sincerity that you don’t often see. There are no false pretenses, no facades, just Meta. Winner of multiple spoken word competitions, these awards and accolades are incredibly impressive, but the best thing about Meta is his authenticity and honesty. After talking to him for a few moments, you feel like you’ve been friends for decades.

Meta Sarmiento was born in Guam, a small island in the Pacific that is an unincorporated territory of the United States. Growing up as a Filipino American on a small island, he often had to negotiate his identity between these intersectionalities. He found himself often questioning whether he was Filipino or American- and what it meant to be from Guam, a place that many people knew nothing about. Fusion of the tools Meta used to negotiate this identity and accept it in all of its intricacies.

In 2007, Meta was pulled out of his chemistry class to listen to spoken word activists in his high school library. He had read poetry before- things like Shakespeare and Robert Frost. But this was something different. It’s hard not to talk to Meta for hours. He’s the type of person that you want to hear all about. In 2007, Meta was pulled out of his chemistry class to listen to spoken word activists in his high school library. He had read poetry before- things like Shakespeare and Robert Frost. But this was something different. Intrigued, Meta went to a poetry slam and his eyes were opened to the multitude of creative ways poetry could be used. He heard crazy poems, erotic poems, poems of every kind and from that moment forward, Meta knew he found his niche.

In these moments, Meta pens down his journey in hopes that others will be able to relate to his experiences and not make the same mistakes that he did. Meta’s poems often take his audience on an emotional journey where they can not only relate to the many bittersweet moments that he shares, but also learn ways to navigate their own personal challenges.

One of Meta’s recent poems called “Momma’s Boy” refers to his masculinity and how much of his learned to love is shaped by brave brown women. Growing up in a gang culture, Meta had internalized schemas of toxic masculinity. The poem allows him to reconcile this piece of himself, dismantling the patriarchy that he learnt. During the climax of the poem, Meta is escorted by a police officer. When his mother is asked if Meta was her son, she simply replied no, she didn’t recognize him. At that moment, he realized how much he hurt someone he loved. Momma’s Boy explores masculinity, by closely following Meta’s relationship with his mother.

At the end of my time with Meta, I realized that we had spent several hours talking about politics, art, and nothing in particular. Similar to the way Meta speaks with an audience, he was a way of pulling you in and getting you interested. His performances are both familiar and thought provoking, more of a shared journey and dialogue than a one-sided speech.

Since moving to Denver in 2016, Meta has continued to hit the ground running. He released a self-published book of poems titled “Tie Your Shoes Kid”, a collection of pieces that explore childhood, family, migration, and love. Additionally, Meta has released a rap album, “Rpt 207”, that is available on Spotify and iTunes.
